A growing body of research indicates that learners are looking for more engaging and impactful education experiences that demonstrate a valuable return on investment. CTE is shown to improve graduation rates as well as postsecondary and workplace readiness, yet a considerable number of families still don't consider CTE the best option for their learner's education. Achieving meaningful growth in learner participation and completion of CTE programs requires changing the narrative so that every learner sees CTE as the go-to path for success in their career, education and life. This plenary is a timely conversation on the latest research and on-the-ground practices centered on changing the CTE narrative featuring Edge Research, The Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, and educating marketing organization Rhodes Branding. This conversation will identify priorities at the national, state and community level to create an impactful narrative about CTE that brings it to the forefront of the career preparation ecosystem.

This informative and engaging session, featuring leaders from the U.S. Departments of Education, Labor, Energy, and Commerce and led by Dr. Amy Loyd, Assistant Secretary for OCTAE, will delve into the significant federal investments that offer opportunities to elevate CTE as a cornerstone of America's workforce development strategy. Perkins Career and Technical Education Act (Perkins V) have increasingly focused on supporting the needs of marginalized learners and closing access and performance gaps among learner groups. As the field continues to grow in its understanding of the unique assets and challenges that each learner community brings to CTE experiences, educators and policymakers are thinking beyond their federal requirements to consider how to best create vibrant, supportive, and diverse learning environments that meet each learner's needs. In this session, we will discuss how CTE can be maximized for each learner to be fully prepared to succeed in their life and career.
