who we are

In 1968, a group of socially motivated designers came together to form EDRA with the shared belief that the design professions could play a greater role in producing environments that mattered to people and where people mattered. Their vision was to create opportunities for linkage and exchange between people in the environment design professions and people in the social sciences to develop new knowledge. The union of design and research would advance our capacity to create livable and healthy places and meaningful people-place relationships.

Today EDRA is an international, interdisciplinary organization whose members hail from diverse environmental design fields and sectors. Over the course of 50 years EDRA's culture has remained true. The lively and engaged environmental design dialogues and debates have amplified. Our cause, of advancing environmental design knowledge and creating places that matter to people and where people matter, has grown too making EDRA more urgent and relevant than ever!
